The Michigan Supreme Court recently issued two decisions impacting PIP insurers. Pirgu v. USAA addressed the standard to follow for awarding attorney’s fees. Hodge v. State Farm addressed how the amount in controversy for a District Court case is determined.

Pirgu is an unfavorable decision for insurers. The core issue in Pirgu was how attorney’s fees are calculated under MCL 500.3148(1). The Supreme Court held in determining the amount of attorney’s fees to be awarded in PIP cases, there did not have to be any proportionality or relationship between the total value of the claim and the amount of attorney’s fees awarded. The Supreme Court limited their decision to claims for statutory attorney’s fees, and it does not impact how Case Evaluation sanctions are calculated. This decision will embolden attorneys to file suit on smaller claims, and gives them incentive to misuse litigation to churn and inflate claims for attorney’s fees.

The issue in Hodge is limited to District Court cases. Jurisdiction in District Court is limited to amounts in controversy of no more than $25,000.00. Plaintiff filed suit in District Court, but at trial claimed damages in excess of $25,000.00. The jury awarded her $85,000.00. The lower appellate courts determined plaintiff was not limited to the amount of damages sought in her Complaint, and the excess verdict divested the District Court’s jurisdiction. The Supreme Court disagreed, and held her maximum recovery was the $25,000.00 jurisdictional limit of District Court. The Supreme Court ruled the determination of the amount in controversy is based upon what is actually sought in a pleading, as opposed to what is claimed at trial. This decision is beneficial to insurers, as it prevents a plaintiff from filing suit in District Court, and then at trial suddenly inflating their claim beyond the jurisdictional limits and claiming a much higher exposure.

The issue in this case is whether the framework for calculating a reasonable attorney fee set forth in Smith v Khouri\(^1\) applies to attorney fee determinations under \(^1\) Smith v Khouri, 481 Mich 519; 751 NW2d 472 (2008).

MCL 500.3148(1) of the no-fault insurance act.\(^2\) The Court of Appeals’ majority affirmed the trial court’s calculation of the attorney fee award, concluding that the Smith framework does not apply to attorney fee determinations under § 3148(1). We disagree with this conclusion and instead hold that the Smith framework—as described in Justice CORRIGAN’s concurring opinion, and as modified herein—applies to attorney fee determinations under § 3148(1).\(^3\) Therefore, in lieu of granting leave to appeal, we reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeals, vacate the fee award, and remand to the trial court for reconsideration of its attorney fee award in light of this opinion.

I. FACTS AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

In 2008, Feridon Pirgu sustained closed head injuries after he was struck by a car driven by an insured of defendant, United Services Automobile Association. Plaintiff, Feridon’s wife Lindita, was appointed as his guardian and conservator. Shortly thereafter, plaintiff sought various personal protection insurance (PIP) benefits for Feridon. Because Feridon was uninsured, the claim was initially assigned to the Michigan Assigned Claims Facility, which then assigned the claim to Citizens Insurance Company. Following a priority dispute between Citizens and defendant, defendant was determined to have first priority for payment of PIP benefits. Defendant began adjusting the claim in 2010, and immediately discontinued payment of the benefits.

\(^2\) MCL 500.3101 et seq.

\(^3\) Smith, 481 Mich at 538-543 (opinion by CORRIGAN, J.).
Plaintiff filed suit against defendant for reinstatement of the discontinued benefits and for attorney fees, seeking a judgment in the amount of $200,000 to $400,000. Following trial, the jury awarded plaintiff $70,237.44. Thereafter, plaintiff’s counsel sought $220,945 in attorney fees, claiming that he had expended more than 600 hours prosecuting the case and that his normal billing rate was $350 per hour. Because the trial court concluded that defendant’s failure to pay the PIP benefits was unreasonable, it found that attorney fees were warranted under § 3148(1). The trial court noted that the jury awarded plaintiff approximately 33 percent of the judgment amount sought, and therefore, the trial court awarded $23,412.48 in attorney fees, approximately 33 percent of the jury verdict.

The Court of Appeals affirmed in a split, unpublished opinion. The majority concluded that it was bound to follow University Rehab Alliance, Inc v Farm Bureau Gen Ins Co of Mich, which held that the Smith framework does not apply to reasonable 4 The variance in the amounts is accounted for by the two different hourly rates for attendant care that plaintiff’s counsel offered to the jury in his closing argument.

5 The jury awarded $54,720 for attendant-care benefits, $7,992 in wage-loss benefits, and $7,525.44 in penalty interest.

6 Defendant has not challenged this ruling.

attorney fee awards under § 3148(1).\(^9\) Applying University Rehab’s totality of the circumstances analysis, the Court of Appeals’ majority concluded that the trial court’s award was reasonable. The majority gave the following justifications: (1) the results achieved were considerably less than the amount sought, (2) the fee award was commensurate with what plaintiff’s counsel would have received under a contingency fee arrangement, and (3) the trial court expressly found that not all of the hours plaintiff’s counsel expended were necessary.\(^10\)

Dissenting in part, Judge GLEICHER would have held that the trial court abused its discretion by neglecting to consider the number of hours plaintiff’s counsel invested in the case and his appropriate hourly rate.\(^11\) The dissent also opined that no-fault cases require a court either to fully apply the factors detailed by this Court in Wood v Detroit Auto Inter-Ins Exch\(^12\) or to fully apply the Smith framework.\(^13\) The dissent also criticized the trial court for only considering the amount in question and the results achieved.\(^14\)

This Court scheduled oral argument on the application, directing the parties to address whether reasonable attorney fee determinations under § 3148(1) are governed by

II. STANDARD OF REVIEW

We review a trial court’s award of attorney fees and costs for an abuse of discretion.\textsuperscript{16} An abuse of discretion occurs when the trial court’s decision is outside the range of reasonable and principled outcomes.\textsuperscript{17} A trial court necessarily abuses its discretion when it makes an error of law.\textsuperscript{18} Questions of law are reviewed de novo.\textsuperscript{19}

III. ANALYSIS

At issue in this case is the proper method for calculating a reasonable attorney fee under MCL 500.3148(1), which provides that:

An attorney is entitled to a reasonable fee... in an action for personal or property insurance benefits which are overdue... if the court finds that the insurer unreasonably refused to pay the claim or unreasonably delayed in making proper payment.

\textsuperscript{19} Universal Underwriters Ins Co v Kneeland, 464 Mich 491, 496; 628 NW2d 491 (2001).
The statute is an exception to the “American rule,” which provides that “attorney fees generally are not recoverable from the losing party as costs in the absence of an exception set forth in a statute or court rule expressly authorizing such an award.”

At the outset, it is helpful to understand the current state of the law regarding the determination of a reasonable attorney fee. In Wood, which also involved an attorney fee award under § 3148(1), we enumerated the following factors for determining the reasonableness of an attorney fee:

- (1) the professional standing and experience of the attorney;
- (2) the skill, time and labor involved;
- (3) the amount in question and the results achieved;
- (4) the difficulty of the case;
- (5) the expenses incurred; and
- (6) the nature and length of the professional relationship with the client.

We held that a trial court should consider the factors outlined in Wood, but that it is not limited to them in making its determination.

In Smith, we reviewed a reasonable attorney fee award as part of case-evaluation sanctions under MCR 2.403(O), and revisited Wood’s multifactor approach. We held that a trial court must begin its reasonableness analysis “by determining the fee customarily charged in the locality for similar legal services,” and then multiplying that number “by the reasonable number of hours expended in the case.”

has calculated this baseline figure, it must consider and briefly discuss on the record the remaining Wood factors and the factors in MRPC 1.5(a)\textsuperscript{25} to determine whether any up or down adjustments from the base number are appropriate.\textsuperscript{26}

There was a split in Smith, however, regarding whether two factors, “the amount in question and the results achieved” (factor 3 under Wood and factor 4 under MRPC 1.5(a)), and “whether the fee is fixed or contingent” (factor 8 under MRPC 1.5(a)), should be considered when determining a reasonable attorney fee for case-evaluation sanctions. The lead opinion concluded that the two factors are not relevant.\textsuperscript{27} Justice CORRIGAN, joined by Justice MARKMAN, concurred with the reasoning and result of the

\textsuperscript{25} The MRPC 1.5(a) factors are:

(1) the time and labor required, the novelty and difficulty of the questions involved, and the skill requisite to perform the legal service properly;

(2) the likelihood, if apparent to the client, that the acceptance of the particular employment will preclude other employment by the lawyer;

(3) the fee customarily charged in the locality for similar legal services;

(4) the amount involved and the results obtained;

(5) the time limitations imposed by the client or by the circumstances;

(6) the nature and length of the professional relationship with the client;

(7) the experience, reputation, and ability of the lawyer or lawyers performing the services; and

(8) whether the fee is fixed or contingent.

lead opinion, but argued that there was no principled basis or textual support for excluding the two factors from consideration.

Subsequently, in University Rehab, the Court of Appeals relied on our decision in Wood, and on the MRPC 1.5(a) factors, to uphold a reasonable attorney fee award made under § 3148(1). Pertinent to this case, the Court of Appeals held that our decision in Smith did not affect its analysis, stating:

First, Smith addressed MCR 2.403(O)(6)(b), which explicitly requires that the reasonable-attorney-fee portion of actual costs be based on a reasonable hourly or daily rate as determined by the trial court. Second, while two justices would have held that whether an attorney has a contingent-fee agreement with a client is not an appropriate factor when considering a reasonable attorney fee as a case-evaluation sanction, that part of the opinion is not binding precedent because a majority of justices did not agree.

Although the University Rehab panel applied a combination of the Wood and MRPC 1.5(a) factors in a manner that is similar to the Smith concurrence’s approach, it did not require the trial court to begin its analysis by making the baseline calculation pursuant to Smith, and instead adopted a totality of the circumstances approach.

As noted, the Court of Appeals’ majority in this case followed University Rehab to conclude that the Smith framework does not apply to reasonable attorney fee determinations under § 3148(1). We disagree with this conclusion. Instead, we conclude that the Smith framework applies in this context.

In Smith, we refined the analysis that applies when a fee-shifting statute or rule requires a trial court to determine a reasonable attorney fee. We have held that the Smith framework applies beyond the case-evaluation sanctions context in appropriate circumstances. Of course, whether it applies in a given case must depend on the plain language of the statute or rule at issue. As we often note, any statutory construction must begin with the plain language. “We must give effect to the Legislature’s intent,

32 See Smith, 481 Mich at 535 (opinion by TAYLOR, C.J.) (“We merely aim to provide a workable, objective methodology for assessing reasonable attorney fees that Michigan courts can apply consistently to our various fee-shifting rules and statutes.”).

33 In Coblentz v City of Novi, 485 Mich 961 (2009), we considered an award of reasonable attorney fees under the Freedom of Information Act. At the time, MCL 15.240(6) provided that “[i]f a person . . . prevails in an action commenced under this section, the court shall award reasonable attorneys’ fees . . . .” In determining the reasonable attorney fees due to the plaintiffs, the trial court considered whether the city’s conduct was corrupt enough to justify fees and whether the fees would bankrupt the city or burden the public welfare. Coblentz, 485 Mich 961. We held that “[n]othing in MCL 15.240(6), or decisions of this Court, authorizes consideration of such factors in determining a reasonable attorney fee award.” Coblentz, 485 Mich 961. Accordingly, we reversed and remanded for a re-determination of the plaintiffs’ reasonable attorney fees using the Smith factors.

34 The answer to Justice CAVANAGH’S question of whether the rule applies to other fee-shifting provisions, Smith, 481 Mich at 554-555 (CAVANAGH, J., dissenting), must be determined by examining the plain language of the rule or statute at issue in a given case.

and the best indicator of the Legislature’s intent is the words used.” 36 These same principles govern the interpretation of court rules. 37

Smith considered a fee award under MCR 2.403(O)(6)(b), which provides for “a reasonable attorney fee based on a reasonable hourly or daily rate as determined by the trial judge for services necessitated by the rejection of the case evaluation . . . .” Section 3148(1) contains slightly different language, providing that “[a]n attorney is entitled to a reasonable fee for advising and representing a claimant in an action for [overdue PIP benefits].”

Although § 3148(1) is phrased differently than MCR 2.403(O)(6)(b), those differences are not material to determining whether the Smith framework applies. The plain language of the statute and the court rule both speak in terms of a reasonable fee. 38 The operative language triggering the Smith analysis is the Legislature’s instruction that an attorney is entitled to a reasonable fee. The University Rehab panel erred by disregarding this language in § 3148(1) when it concluded that Smith was distinguishable because it only applies to case-evaluation sanctions. 39 Because the plain language of 37 Duncan, 494 Mich at 723.

38 We agree with Justice CORRIGAN’s statement in Smith that the plain language of MCR 2.403(O)(6)(b) “merely requires that the court award a ‘reasonable attorney fee’; it does not suggest that ‘reasonable attorney fee’ means something different for case evaluation sanctions than for any other situation.” Smith, 481 Mich at 539 (opinion by CORRIGAN, J.).

39 University Rehab, 279 Mich App at 700 n 3. The University Rehab panel also disregarded Smith’s repeated use of language of general applicability, which clearly § 3148(1) speaks in terms of awarding a “reasonable fee,” we conclude that the Smith framework governing reasonable fee determinations is equally applicable in this context.

Despite reaching the wrong conclusion, University Rehab properly recognized the non-binding nature of the lead opinion’s conclusion in Smith that two of the factors—“the amount in question and the results achieved” and “whether the fee is fixed or contingent”—are not relevant in the case-evaluation context. While we do not decide today whether those factors should be considered in that context, we hold that they must be considered by a trial court when awarding attorney fees under § 3148(1). We have long recognized that the results obtained are relevant to determining the reasonable value of legal services. The results obtained are indicative of the exercise of skill and contemplated that the methodology announced therein could be applicable to reasonable attorney fee determinations outside the case-evaluation context. See e.g., Smith, 481 Mich at 522 (opinion by TAYLOR, C.J.) (“We take this opportunity to clarify that the trial court should begin the process of calculating a reasonable attorney fee . . . .”) (emphasis added); id. at 530 (“We conclude that our current multifactor approach needs some fine-tuning.”); id. at 533 (“Having clarified how a trial court should go forward in calculating a reasonable attorney fee . . . .”) (emphasis added).

University Rehab, 279 Mich App at 700 n 3, citing People v Sexton, 458 Mich 43, 65; 580 NW2d 404 (1998) (“[A] majority of the Court must agree on a ground for decision in order to make that binding precedent for future cases.”) (quotation marks and citation omitted).

This is in accord with the lead opinion in Smith, since it recognized that both factors “may be relevant in other situations.” Smith, 481 Mich at 534 n 20 (opinion by TAYLOR, C.J.). See also Beach v Kelly Auto Group, Inc, 482 Mich 1101, 1102 (2008) (YOUNG, J., concurring). And, in any event, the parties have offered no justification for excluding these factors when awarding attorney fees under § 3148(1).

See Becht v Miller, 279 Mich 629, 640; 273 NW 294 (1937) (“In ascertaining the reasonable value of legal services, the court should consider . . . the results obtained.”).
judgment on the part of the attorney.\textsuperscript{43} Similarly, the nature of the fee arrangement is also a relevant factor because a contingency fee percentage may “express an attorney’s expectations of the case and the risks involved.”\textsuperscript{44} Accordingly, a trial court must consider both of these factors when making adjustments to the baseline fee award.

Thus, while we agree with portions of \textit{University Rehab}, we disagree with that Court’s conclusion that \textit{Smith} is inapplicable to reasonable attorney fee determinations under § 3148(1). In particular, the \textit{University Rehab} panel erred by failing to begin its analysis by calculating the baseline figure pursuant to \textit{Smith}. Therefore, we take this opportunity to overrule \textit{University Rehab} to the extent that it is inconsistent with our opinion today. Having done so, we conclude that the Court of Appeals erred by holding that the \textit{Smith} framework does not apply to reasonable attorney fee determinations under § 3148(1).

In sum, we hold that when determining the reasonableness of attorney fees awarded under § 3148(1), a trial court must begin its analysis by determining the reasonable hourly rate customarily charged in the locality for similar services.\textsuperscript{45} The trial court must then multiply that rate by the reasonable number of hours expended in the

With respect to the reasonable hourly rate, “the fee applicant must present something more than anecdotal statements to establish the customary fee for the locality.” \textit{Id.} at 532. “The fees customarily charged . . . can be established by testimony or empirical data found in surveys and other reliable reports.” \textit{Id.} at 531-532.
case to arrive at a baseline figure.\textsuperscript{46} Thereafter, the trial court must consider \textit{all} of the remaining \textit{Wood} and MRPC 1.5(a) factors to determine whether an up or down adjustment is appropriate.\textsuperscript{47}

Unfortunately, \textit{Smith} requires trial courts to consult two different lists of factors containing significant overlap, which unnecessarily complicates the analysis and increases the risk that courts may engage in incomplete or duplicative consideration of the enumerated factors. Therefore, we distill the remaining \textit{Wood} and MRPC 1.5(a) factors into one list to assist trial courts in this endeavor:

(1) the experience, reputation, and ability of the lawyer or lawyers performing the services,

(2) the difficulty of the case, i.e., the novelty and difficulty of the questions involved, and the skill requisite to perform the legal service properly,

(3) the amount in question and the results obtained,

(4) the expenses incurred,

(5) the nature and length of the professional relationship with the client,

(6) the likelihood, if apparent to the client, that acceptance of the particular employment will preclude other employment by the lawyer,

(7) the time limitations imposed by the client or by the circumstances, and

(8) whether the fee is fixed or contingent.

These factors are not exclusive, and the trial court may consider any additional relevant \textsuperscript{46} \textit{Id.} at 531.

\textsuperscript{47} \textit{Id.}
factors.\textsuperscript{48} In order to facilitate appellate review, the trial court should briefly discuss its view of each of the factors above on the record and justify the relevance and use of any additional factors.\textsuperscript{49}

IV. APPLICATION

Having clarified the proper framework that applies to reasonable fee awards under § 3148(1), we turn to the award in the instant case. The trial court erred by not starting its analysis by multiplying a reasonable hourly rate by the reasonable number of hours expended. Further, although it acknowledged some of the \textit{Wood} and MRPC 1.5(a) factors, the trial court also erred by primarily relying on only one factor—the amount sought and results achieved—and failing to briefly discuss its view of the other factors. Therefore, the trial court necessarily abused its discretion, and as a result, the Court of Appeals erred by affirming the trial court’s attorney fee award. Accordingly, we reverse the Court of Appeals, vacate the fee award, and remand to the trial court for reconsideration in light of this opinion.\textsuperscript{50}

\textsuperscript{48} \textit{Id.} at 530.

\textsuperscript{49} \textit{Id.} at 529 n 14, 531, 531 n 15.

\textsuperscript{50} Defendant argues that plaintiff entirely failed to meet her burden of proof to support her claim for attorney fees. See \textit{Smith}, 481 Mich at 528-529 (opinion by TAYLOR, C.J.). Because the trial court failed to properly apply \textit{Smith}, it is unclear whether plaintiff met her burden. Accordingly, the trial court should consider this issue on remand when it applies the \textit{Smith} framework.
V. CONCLUSION

We hold that when calculating a reasonable attorney fee award under § 3148(1), a trial court must follow the Smith framework, as outlined by Justice CORRIGAN’s concurring opinion and as modified by this opinion. The trial court abused its discretion by failing to do so, and the Court of Appeals’ majority erred to the extent that it affirmed the trial court’s attorney fee award. Therefore, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, the fee award is vacated, and the case is remanded to the trial court for reconsideration in light of this opinion.

LINDA HODGE,
Plaintiff-Appellant,

STATE FARM MUTUAL AUTOMOBILE INSURANCE COMPANY, Defendant-Appellee.

BEFORE THE ENTIRE BENCH

LARSEN, J.

This case involves the proper application of MCL 600.8301, which grants the district court “exclusive jurisdiction in civil actions when the amount in controversy does not exceed $25,000.00.” For at least 160 years, Michigan courts have held that the allegations in the complaint establish the amount in controversy.\textsuperscript{1} We affirm that principle today.

This case arises out of a lawsuit for no-fault damages filed in the 36th District Court. Plaintiff Linda Hodge was struck by a car in Detroit and sustained serious injuries. She brought this suit for first-party no-fault benefits against defendant State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Company, which insured the driver who struck her. She sought damages for her medical expenses, loss of wages, and attendant-care needs. In two separate parts of her complaint, Hodge stated that she sought damages “not in excess of $25,000.”

During discovery, State Farm came to believe that Hodge would present at trial proof of damages in excess of $25,000. Such proofs, in State Farm’s view, would take the “amount in controversy” above the district court’s jurisdictional limit. State Farm, therefore, filed a motion in limine, seeking to prevent Hodge from presenting evidence of claims exceeding $25,000 and to prevent the jury from awarding damages above that limit. The district court denied the motion.

At trial, Hodge did present proof of injuries exceeding $25,000, including more than $150,000 in attendant-care services alone. At the conclusion of the trial, the jury returned a verdict of $85,957. The district court then reduced its judgment for Hodge to $25,000 in damages and $1,769 in no-fault interest.

State Farm appealed in the Wayne Circuit Court, claiming that the amount in controversy exceeded the district court’s jurisdictional limit and that capping Hodge’s recovery at $25,000 could not cure the defect. The circuit court agreed and reversed the district court’s order of judgment.

The Court of Appeals initially denied plaintiff’s application for leave to appeal. After this Court remanded for consideration as on leave granted, the Court of Appeals consolidated this case with another brought in district court by plaintiff’s counsel that raised the same jurisdictional question. In the consolidated appeal, the Court of Appeals affirmed the circuit court’s decision, holding that although the district court’s jurisdiction “will most often be determined by reviewing the amount of damages or injuries a party claims in his or her pleadings,” the district courts here were divested of jurisdiction when the “pretrial discovery answers, the arguments of [plaintiff’s] counsel before trial and the presentation of evidence at trial,” pointed to damages in excess of $25,000.

The plaintiff in each of the consolidated cases sought leave to appeal in this Court. We initially granted leave to appeal in the companion case, Moody v Home Owners, and held this case in abeyance pending our decision in Moody. However, this Court subsequently granted the plaintiffs-appellants’ motion to dismiss their own appeal in

Moody.\textsuperscript{8} We then vacated our abeyance order and granted leave to appeal in this case, limited to two issues:

(1) whether a district court is divested of subject-matter jurisdiction when a plaintiff alleges less than $25,000 in damages in his or her complaint, but seeks more than $25,000 in damages at trial, i.e., whether the “amount in controversy” exceeds $25,000 under such circumstances . . . and, if not, (2) whether such conduct nevertheless divests the district court of subject-matter jurisdiction on the basis that the amount alleged in the complaint was made fraudulently or in bad faith.\textsuperscript{9}

The 1963 Michigan Constitution, art 6, § 1, establishes the circuit court as a “trial court of general jurisdiction,” and authorizes the Legislature to establish courts of limited jurisdiction. The Legislature exercised this constitutional authority in 1968 by creating the district court.\textsuperscript{10} MCL 600.8301(1) establishes the district court’s limited jurisdiction:

The district court has exclusive jurisdiction in civil actions when the amount in controversy does not exceed $25,000.00.\textsuperscript{11}

\textsuperscript{8} Moody v Home Owners Ins Co, 858 NW2d 462 (Mich, 2015).

\textsuperscript{9} Hodge v State Farm Mut Auto Ins Co, 497 Mich 957 (2015).

\textsuperscript{10} MCL 600.8101, as enacted by 1968 PA 154.

\textsuperscript{11} When the Legislature established the district court in 1968, it set the court’s jurisdictional limit at $3,000. See 1968 PA 154. The Legislature has twice raised the jurisdictional limit, to $10,000 in 1971, see 1971 PA 148, and to $25,000 in 1996, see 1996 PA 388.
The plain language of MCL 600.8301(1), read in conjunction with art 6, § 1 and MCL 600.605, establishes that, in civil actions where no other jurisdictional statute applies, the district court is limited to deciding cases in which the amount in controversy does not exceed $25,000. The district court, therefore, may not award damages in excess of that amount. The question before this Court is how to determine the “amount in controversy”: by the pleadings or by the proofs at trial?

Our cases have long held that courts are to determine their subject-matter jurisdiction by reference to the pleadings. As far back as 1855, when determining whether the circuit court or the justice of peace had jurisdiction over a dispute, this

12 “Circuit courts have original jurisdiction to hear and determine all civil claims and remedies, except where exclusive jurisdiction is given in the constitution or by statute to some other court or where the circuit courts are denied jurisdiction by the constitution or statutes of this state.”

13 The 1963 Michigan Constitution, art 6, § 1 dictates that the circuit court is to be the only court of general jurisdiction, but that the Legislature may establish courts of limited jurisdiction. The Legislature slightly restricted the circuit court’s jurisdiction in MCL 600.605 by removing the circuit court’s original jurisdiction in cases “where exclusive jurisdiction is given in the constitution or by statute to some other court . . . .” The Legislature granted such exclusive jurisdiction to the district court in MCL 600.8301(1). However, because the Legislature only has the authority to establish courts of limited jurisdiction, the district court’s jurisdiction is limited to the explicit grant of Chapter 83 of the Revised Judicature Act of 1961. See MCL 600.8301 et seq.

14 See Zimmer v Schindehette, 272 Mich 407, 409; 262 NW 379 (1935) (declaring void a judgment rendered by a justice of the peace that was in excess of his jurisdiction). See also Clohset v No Name Corp (On Remand), 302 Mich App 550, 567; 840 NW2d 375 (2013) (“We are cognizant of the fact that, generally speaking, a district court cannot render a judgment that exceeds its jurisdictional limit.”).

15 The 1850 Michigan Constitution, art 6, § 18, specified that “justices of the peace shall have exclusive jurisdiction to the amount of one hundred dollars . . . .” The 1908 Michigan Constitution had a similar clause. See 1908 Michigan Constitution, art 7, § 16.
Court held that “jurisdiction must be determined . . ., where it depends on amount, by the sum claimed in the declaration or writ.” This “well settled” rule would apply, the Court surmised, even if the plaintiff presented proof of damages, or the jury returned a verdict, exceeding the court’s jurisdictional limit. Neither the parties nor our own research has revealed any case deviating from this common-law rule.

16 Strong, 3 Mich at 472. This rule appears to be even older than Strong. The Court in Strong noted that even before the adoption of the 1850 Constitution, at issue in that case, “it was never doubted, that the test of jurisdiction was the amount claimed in the plaintiff’s writ.” Id. at 470.

17 Id. at 473 (“[T]he justice will not be ousted of his jurisdiction by the jury returning a verdict, or by proof of damages beyond his jurisdiction.”).

18 We note that the federal courts also apply this principle. See, e.g., St Paul Mercury Indem Co v Red Cab Co, 303 US 283, 288; 58 S Ct 586; 82 L Ed 845 (1938) (“The rule governing dismissal for want of jurisdiction in cases brought in the federal court is that . . . the sum claimed by the plaintiff controls if the claim is apparently made in good faith.”). Several other states are in accord. See, e.g., Brunaugh v Worley, 6 Ohio St 597, 598 (1856) (“The jurisdiction of the court of common pleas depends upon the amount claimed in the petition.”); Wagner v Nagel, 23 NW 308, 309 (Minn, 1885) (“It is well settled in this court that where the jurisdiction of a court depends upon ‘the amount in controversy,’ this is determined by the amount claimed.”); Sellery v Ward, 21 Cal 2d 300, 304; 131 P 2d 550 (1942) (“Where the action is brought in good faith and the cause of action stated is within the jurisdiction of the court in which it is commenced, the mere fact that the judgment is for less than the jurisdictional amount of that court does not establish that it was without jurisdiction.”); Brannon v Pacific Employers Ins Co, 148 Tex 289, 294; 224 SW 2d 466 (1949) (“It is a fundamental rule that in determining the jurisdiction of the trial court, the allegations of the petition made in good faith are determinative of the cause of action.”); Holmquist v Spinelli, 139 Conn 429, 431; 94 A 2d 621 (1953) (“From the earliest times in this state, and in a long line of cases, it has been held that the amount of the matter in demand is to be discovered only by reference to the complaint.”); White v Marine Transport Lines, Inc, 372 So 2d 81, 84 (Fla, 1979) (“[T]he good faith demand of the plaintiff at the time of instituting suit determines the ability of the particular court to entertain the action.”).
Nor is there any reason to believe that the Legislature intended to depart from this well-settled practice when it created the district court and established by statute the monetary limits on its jurisdiction. When the Legislature, without indicating an intent to abrogate the common law, borrows terms of art in which are accumulated the legal tradition and meaning of centuries of practice, it presumably knows and adopts the cluster of ideas that were attached to each borrowed word in the body of learning from which it was taken and the meaning its use will convey to the judicial mind unless otherwise instructed.\[19\]

Here, the statute neither defines the critical term, “amount in controversy,”\[20\] nor in any other way suggests an intent to depart from the long-established rule that the pleadings determine the amount in controversy for purposes of the court’s subject-matter jurisdiction.

\[19\] Sekhar v United States, 570 US ___, ___; 133 S Ct 2720, 2724; 186 L Ed 2d 794 (2013), quoting Morissette v United States, 342 US 246, 263; 72 S Ct 240; 96 L Ed 288 (1952). See also In re Bradley Estate, 494 Mich 367, 377; 835 NW2d 545 (2013) (“[W]hen the Legislature chooses to employ a common-law term without indicating an intent to alter the common law, the term will be interpreted consistent with its common-law meaning.”); Alvan Motor Freight, Inc v Dep’t of Treasury, 281 Mich App 35, 41; 761 NW2d 269 (2008) (“[W]hen enacting legislation, the Legislature is presumed to be fully aware of existing laws, including judicial decisions.”).

\[20\] “Pursuant to MCL 8.3a, undefined statutory terms are to be given their plain and ordinary meaning, unless the undefined word or phrase is a term of art.” People v Thompson, 477 Mich 146, 151; 730 NW2d 708 (2007). If a word or phrase is a term of art, it “shall be construed and understood according to [its] peculiar and appropriate meaning.” MCL 8.3a. Although the term “amount in controversy” was not specifically used in the 1850 or 1908 Constitutions, it has long been a part of our state’s legal lexicon and was used in 19th century Court opinions to indicate the amount at stake in the suit. See, e.g., Olcott v Hanson, 12 Mich 452, 455 (1864) (opinion of Martin, J.); Truesdail v Ward, 24 Mich 117, 120 (1871) (opinion of Graves, J.). That amount was always determined based upon the amount claimed in the pleadings. See, e.g., Strong, 3 Mich at 470.
Thus, it is not quite right to say, as did the Court of Appeals, that nothing in MCL 600.8301(1), MCR 2.227(A)(1), or MCR 2.116(C)(4) “requires that a court limit its jurisdictional query to the amount in controversy alleged in the pleadings.” Instead, the statute and court rules are properly read as incorporating the long-settled rule that the jurisdictional amount is determined on the face of the pleadings.

Both the Court of Appeals and defendant urge that dictionary definitions of statutory terms support a contrary result. We find the cited references unhelpful. The Court of Appeals noted that Black’s Law Dictionary defines “amount in controversy” as “[t]he damages claimed or relief demanded by the injured party in a lawsuit.” But this definition is at least as consistent with the common-law rule as it is with the new rule espoused by the Court of Appeals. The dispute here is over how and when to determine

21 “The district court has exclusive jurisdiction in civil actions when the amount in controversy does not exceed $25,000.00.”

22 “When the court in which a civil action is pending determines that it lacks jurisdiction of the subject matter of the action, but that some other Michigan court would have jurisdiction of the action, the court may order the action transferred to the other court in a place where venue would be proper. If the question of jurisdiction is raised by the court on its own initiative, the action may not be transferred until the parties are given notice and an opportunity to be heard on the jurisdictional issue.”

23 “The motion [for summary disposition] may be based on one or more of these grounds, and must specify the grounds on which it is based: . . . The court lacks jurisdiction of the subject matter.”

25 When defining a legal term or phrase with a pedigree as long as “amount in controversy,” little is likely to be gained from defining the individual words it comprises. Thus, we find unpersuasive the Court of Appeals’ close examination of the individual words “amount” and “controversy.”

26 Id. at 430, quoting Black’s Law Dictionary (9th ed).
the “damages claimed or relief demanded”: on the pleadings or on the proofs? As a method for determining the district court’s subject-matter jurisdiction, then, the Black’s definition of “amount in controversy” is simply incomplete.

Defendant’s resort to the dictionary fares no better. MCR 2.227(A)(1) allows a court to transfer an action to another tribunal when it “determines that it lacks jurisdiction of the subject matter of the action.” Defendant cites multiple dictionaries for the proposition that “determines” implies the result of research or investigation. From this, defendant argues that a court may look beyond the pleadings to determine its jurisdiction. But the conclusion does not clearly follow from the premise. Even if “to determine” implies that inquiry will precede decision, neither the court rule nor common English usage conveys the sense that the inquiry need be prolonged. Just as government officials routinely “determine” age or identity by looking at photo ID, a court might well “determine” the jurisdictional amount by looking at the pleadings.

We are left, therefore, with the firm impression that in adopting MCL 600.8301, the Legislature intended to continue the longstanding practice of determining the jurisdictional amount based on the amount prayed for in the complaint. The Court of Appeals was aware of this “ancient” common-law rule, but thought it inapplicable because the plaintiff pleaded “a claim for relief ostensibly within the limits of the district court’s subject-matter jurisdiction but then plac[ed] in dispute through evidence and argument at trial an amount of damages much greater than the court’s jurisdictional limit.” We recognize, as did the Court of Appeals, the potential for “artful pleading” that the common-law rule creates, and we have our own concerns about the implications of the rule. But, absent a finding of bad faith, we do not believe that

For example, an unscrupulous attorney might, without fully informing his client, limit his client’s recovery to $25,000 by filing in district court but then seek attorney fees based on the full amount of damages returned by the jury, thereby sacrificing his client’s interests to his own. In this regard, we remind the trial courts that an attorney is entitled to recover a reasonable fee for advising and representing a client in a personal protection insurance (PIP) action. MCL 500.3148(1). After calculating the baseline attorney fee figure, the trial court should consider, though is not limited to, a number of factors when determining a reasonable fee for such representation. Pirgu v United Servs Auto Ass’n, ___ Mich ___, ___; ___ NW2d ___ (2016) (Docket No. 150834), slip op at 13. These factors are:

1. the experience, reputation, and ability of the lawyer or lawyers performing the services,

2. the difficulty of the case, i.e., the novelty and difficulty of the questions involved, and the skill requisite to perform the legal service properly,

3. the amount in question and the results obtained,

4. the expenses incurred,

5. the nature and length of the professional relationship with the client,

6. the likelihood, if apparent to the client, that acceptance of the particular employment will preclude other employment by the lawyer,

7. the time limitations imposed by the client or by the circumstances, and

8. whether the fee is fixed or contingent. [Id. at ___.] Factor (3) suggests that the fees awarded must be reasonable in light of the $25,000 limit on a plaintiff’s recovery in district court.

This Court has held that a court will not retain subject-matter jurisdiction over a case “when . . . fraud upon the court is apparent” from allegations pleaded in bad faith. Fix v these concerns affect the district court’s jurisdiction, which has always been determined based on the amount alleged in the pleadings.

The common-law rule is marked not only by its longevity but by its simplicity. The ad damnum clause in the plaintiff’s complaint is a straightforward measure of the court’s jurisdiction. And its accompanying limit on recovery should deter fully-informed plaintiffs from too-readily seeking to litigate a more valuable claim in district court. By contrast, the rule articulated by the Court of Appeals renders the district court’s jurisdiction contingent and uncertain and raises a host of new complications. The Court of Appeals believed that the district court in the instant case was divested of jurisdiction when the “pretrial discovery answers, the arguments of ... counsel before trial, and the presentation of evidence at trial[... all showed that” what it deemed the “amount in controversy . . . far exceeded” the district court’s jurisdictional limit. But if plaintiff’s proofs here were excessive, would proofs exceeding the jurisdictional limit by $1,000 be enough to divest the district court of jurisdiction? $100? $1? What would be the effect on the resources of the court system? If a plaintiff presented evidence over the Sissung, 83 Mich 561, 563; 47 NW 340 (1890). In Fix, this Court dismissed the plaintiff’s suit as being brought in bad faith because the amount claimed was “unjustifiable” and could not be proved. Id. However, beyond that holding, our cases give no indication of what would constitute bad faith sufficient to oust the court of jurisdiction. The Court of Appeals seemed concerned with plaintiffs filing in district court knowing that provable actual damages exceeded the $25,000 jurisdictional limit. See Moody, 304 Mich App at 431. We question, but do not decide, whether a fully-informed plaintiff acts in bad faith by filing a claim in district court, thereby limiting his own recovery to $25,000. In this case, defendant made no allegation of bad faith in the pleadings and there has been no finding of bad faith by the district court.

jurisdictional cap on the last day of testimony, would the entire trial have to begin anew in the circuit court? Could a losing plaintiff conveniently “discover” and submit receipts above the jurisdictional amount on the last day of a trial that is not going his way? Would the district court be divested of subject-matter jurisdiction if a jury returned a verdict beyond the jurisdictional limit, even though neither party had argued for that amount? What would happen if a plaintiff wished to present multiple theories of recovery? None of these questions attend the longstanding common-law rule.

We, therefore, hold what the jurisprudence of this state has long established: in its subject-matter jurisdiction inquiry, a district court determines the amount in controversy using the prayer for relief set forth in the plaintiff’s pleadings, calculated exclusive of fees, costs, and interest. Hodge’s complaint prayed for money damages “not in excess of $25,000,” the jurisdictional limit of the district court. Even though her proofs exceeded that amount, the prayer for relief controls when determining the amount in controversy, and the limit of awardable damages. Because there were no allegations, and therefore no findings, of bad faith in the pleadings, the district court had subject-matter jurisdiction over the plaintiff’s claim.

At issue here is the subject-matter jurisdiction of the district court, which is exclusive in “civil actions when the amount in controversy does not exceed $25,000.00.” MCL 600.8301(1). I join the majority because I agree that “amount in controversy” as used in MCL 600.8301(1) refers to the “prayer for relief set forth in the plaintiff’s pleadings . . . .” I further agree that a trial court may be ousted of subject-matter jurisdiction when “fraud upon the court is apparent” from pleadings made in “bad faith.” I write separately only to identify circumstances that, in my view, might raise questions concerning “bad faith” pleading and thereby warrant dismissal of a case for lack of jurisdiction. While bad-faith pleadings are rare, when these do occur, they undermine the law of our state and the integrity of our judicial process, and they give rise to conditions at trial in which a party may be unfairly prejudiced.
I. FACTS & HISTORY

This case arose when plaintiff sued defendant in the 36th District Court for first-party no-fault benefits after plaintiff had been struck by a vehicle driven by a person insured by defendant. Plaintiff’s complaint alleged bodily injury, including a “closed head injury,” “pains in left shoulder, back, neck area, [and] lower back,” and a “bruise on [the] left ankle.” She also alleged financial injury, including “expenses for care, recovery, or rehabilitation,” “loss of wages,” “replacement services,” and “attendant care.” In her complaint’s prayer for relief, plaintiff sought “damages in whatever amount Plaintiff is found to be entitled not in excess of 25,000.00 . . . .” The parties then engaged in discovery, and, based on information provided by plaintiff, defendant estimated that plaintiff’s claim was worth nearly $250,000. As a result, defendant filed a motion in limine to prevent plaintiff from offering at trial evidence that her claim exceeded $25,000, but the district court denied that motion. Plaintiff eventually submitted evidence at trial of injuries exceeding $25,000, including more than $150,000 in attendant-care services. The jury returned a verdict of $85,957, which the district court duly reduced to $25,000.

Defendant appealed in the Wayne Circuit Court, arguing that the district court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction. The circuit court concluded that plaintiff claimed damages exceeding $25,000 and thus reversed the district court. Plaintiff then appealed in the Court of Appeals. After we directed that Court to consider the case as on leave granted, it agreed with the circuit court, concluding that the district court had been divested of jurisdiction when plaintiff “presented evidence of damages far exceeding [its] $25,000 subject-matter jurisdiction.” Moody v Home Owners Ins Co, 304 Mich App 415, 431; 849 NW2d 31 (2014). We then granted leave to appeal on two issues:

(1) whether a district court is divested of subject-matter jurisdiction when a plaintiff alleges less than $25,000 in damages in his or her complaint, but seeks more than $25,000 in damages at trial, i.e., whether the “amount in controversy” exceeds $25,000 under such circumstances, see MCL 600.8301(1); and, if not, (2) whether such conduct nevertheless divests the district court of subject-matter jurisdiction on the basis that the amount alleged in the complaint was made fraudulently or in bad faith. [Hodge v State Farm Mut Auto Ins Co, 497 Mich 957, 957-958 (2015).]

II. ANALYSIS

I agree with the majority’s analysis of the two issues on which this Court granted leave. I write separately only to elaborate on my views as to the second issue-- under what circumstances may a prayer for relief, although nominally falling within the district court’s statutory “amount in controversy” requirement, nonetheless clearly exhibit bad faith and thereby warrant dismissal.¹ In my view, the relevant jurisdictional inquiry does not automatically come to an end when a plaintiff evidences a willingness to accept an amount less than the jurisdictional maximum; rather, particular circumstances may warrant a district court’s inquiring more deeply into whether the amount in controversy was, at the time it was alleged, alleged in bad faith.² I emphasize that bad-faith pleadings

² One federal practice treatise states that “[u]nder well-settled principles of pleading, the plaintiff is the master of the statement of his claim.” 14AA Fed Prac & Proc Juris (4th ed), § 3702. But the treatise goes on to note that the plaintiff’s choice controls only “absent a showing of bad faith.” Id. In the instant case, because the present record does to obtain subject-matter jurisdiction have been extraordinarily rare—indeed this and the two cases mentioned in note 3 of this opinion are the first brought to this Court’s attention during my tenure, and I believe further inquiry in this regard must be undertaken.³ For the reasons set forth below, however, I believe it is important that it be made clear, for the integrity of both the legislative and judicial branches, that this Court will not tolerate cases or controversies that ought to be heard in one court being heard in another as a result of a bad-faith pleading.

A. BAD FAITH

Subject-matter jurisdiction “is the power to hear and determine a cause or matter.” Bowie v Arder, 441 Mich 23, 36; 490 NW2d 568 (1992) (quotation marks and citation omitted). Because a court has no inherent subject-matter jurisdiction, such jurisdiction must be “conferred upon [the court] by the power which creates it.” Detroit v Rabaut, 389 Mich 329, 331; 206 NW2d 625 (1973). Jurisdiction accordingly “arises by law,” and a court must, notwithstanding a party’s stipulation, consent, or waiver, “take notice of the limits of its authority” in order to safeguard the integrity of the judicial process by ensuring that it does not exercise authority it does not have. Bowie, 441 Mich at 56. Hence, if the court “recognize[s] its lack of jurisdiction,” it must “act accordingly by ³ Two other such cases recently have come before the Court. Moody v Home Owners Ins Co, 497 Mich 866; 858 NW2d 462 (2015); Madison v AAA of Mich, 858 NW2d 463 (2015). Counsel in these two cases is also plaintiff’s counsel in the instant case.

staying proceedings, dismissing the action, or otherwise disposing thereof, at any stage of the proceeding.” Fox v Bd of Regents of Univ of Mich, 375 Mich 238, 242; 134 NW2d 146 (1965) (quotation marks and citation omitted); accord Straus v Governor, 459 Mich 526, 532; 592 NW2d 53 (1999) (“[A] court at all times is required to question sua sponte its own jurisdiction . . . .”) (quotation marks and citation omitted).

This Court has long recognized that when a plaintiff’s pleadings are clearly made in bad faith for the purpose of satisfying a trial court’s subject-matter jurisdiction, the trial court is ousted of jurisdiction and must dismiss the matter. See Fix v Sissung, 83 Mich 561, 563; 47 NW 340 (1890). Fix concerned a dispute between neighbors stemming from a gaggle of the plaintiff’s geese “trespassing” on the defendant’s property. The defendant took possession of the geese and refused to return them unless the plaintiff first paid for property damage caused by the geese and for the cost of feeding them. The plaintiff then sued the defendant in the circuit court for return of the geese.
The defendant moved to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, arguing that because the geese were worth less than $100, only a state justice of the peace could hear the case.\(^4\) The plaintiff responded with a declaration that the geese were worth $200, and the trial court permitted the case to proceed. However, it also warned the plaintiff that it would dismiss the case if he “should fail to bring himself within the statute”-- that is, within the jurisdictional limit-- based on the evidence presented at trial. Id.

Notwithstanding this admonition, the “plaintiff offered no proof [at trial] as to the value \(^4\) Const 1850, art 6, § 18 (“In civil cases justices of the peace shall have exclusive jurisdiction to the amount of one hundred dollars . . . .”).
of his geese, and strenuously opposed the introduction of evidence by the defendant of their value.”  Id. The trial court admitted such evidence, which showed that the geese were worth only $9, and dismissed the case.

The plaintiff appealed in this Court, arguing that his case fell within the circuit court’s jurisdiction because he had alleged the geese’s value to be $200, well above the $100 jurisdictional limit of state justices of the peace. We acknowledged that a trial court’s jurisdiction may be properly retained on the basis of a good-faith allegation of property value exceeding the jurisdictional limit, even where the value proved at trial does not ultimately exceed the jurisdictional limit. But because the plaintiff’s declaration that the geese were worth $200 was “unjustifiable,” we concluded that “the value alleged . . . was made in bad faith, and was a fraud upon the court.”  Id. Accordingly, we affirmed the trial court’s dismissal.  Fix thus stands for the proposition that a court subject to a jurisdictional limit may dismiss a complaint for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction, notwithstanding that the jurisdictional allegations are nominally valid, when the court concludes that those allegations were clearly made in bad faith.

As Fix demonstrates, a plaintiff pleads in bad faith by pleading an amount in controversy with an intention to present evidence and argument—i.e., to litigate that case—in a manner inconsistent with that amount. Such bad faith in the pleadings may be assessed based on evidence subsequently offered at trial, but it is important to recognize that the result in Fix was not a product of bad faith exhibited at trial, but a function of bad faith evidenced in the complaint, which became clearly apparent only after the plaintiff’s submissions at trial demonstrated both that he had fabricated the value of the geese in order to satisfy the court’s jurisdictional threshold and that he had no initial intention to present a $200 case to the court.

The plaintiff in Fix thus inflated the value of his claim to exceed a court’s minimum jurisdictional limit. By contrast, plaintiff in the instant case may have diminished the value of her claim to avoid exceeding a court’s maximum jurisdictional limit. Notwithstanding the seeming distinction between Fix and the instant case, Fix is nonetheless clear, as the majority recognizes, that a court’s lawful jurisdiction cannot be premised on a pleading made in bad faith. And there is no logical reason why the Fix principle should be limited to jurisdiction obtained by a bad-faith pleading that overstates the value of a claim and not also apply to jurisdiction obtained by a bad-faith pleading that understates the value of a claim. A plaintiff simply does not have unchecked discretion to create jurisdiction in either way. See, e.g., In re Return of Forfeited Goods, 452 Mich 659, 671; 550 NW2d 782 (1996) (“It is well established that [j]urisdiction of the subject-matter cannot be given by consent.”) (quotation marks and citation omitted; alteration in original).

5 Plaintiff sought $25,000 in damages, yet discovery and evidence subsequently indicated that her claim may have been worth as much as $250,000. Questions of bad faith aside, why a plaintiff might be prompted to reduce recovery by as much as 90% in order to have it heard in one judicial venue instead of another is itself a matter of considerable consequence for the fairness of the justice system and the equal rule of law, although beyond the scope of inquiry in this case. At the very least, however, I do believe that plaintiff’s attorney had a professional and ethical obligation to explain clearly to the client both the rationale for such a substantial reduction in recovery and the likely waiver of the right to sue for the balance of the claim in excess of the jurisdictional maximum. MRPC 1.4(b) (“A lawyer shall explain a matter to the extent reasonably necessary to permit the client to make informed decisions regarding the representation.”); see also MRPC 1.7(b).
B. DISTRICT COURT JURISDICTION

Having set forth Fix’s general principle that pleading in bad faith ousts a trial court of jurisdiction, I turn then to the specific question of the jurisdiction of the court at issue in this case, the district court. Our Constitution establishes “one trial court of general jurisdiction known as the circuit court” and authorizes the Legislature to further establish “courts of limited jurisdiction.” Const 1963, art 6, § 1 (emphasis added).6 The Legislature in response established the district court,7 which “has exclusive jurisdiction in civil actions when the amount in controversy does not exceed $25,000.00.”8 MCL 600.8301(1) (emphasis added). I agree with the majority’s straightforward observation that the district court is thereby “limited to deciding cases” within that amount.

By separating disputes according to whether the amount in controversy exceeds or does not exceed $25,000, § 8301(1) reflects the Legislature’s intention to classify civil 6 See also MCL 600.605 (“Circuit courts have original jurisdiction to hear and determine all civil claims and remedies, except where exclusive jurisdiction is given in the constitution or by statute to some other court or where the circuit courts are denied jurisdiction by the constitution or statutes of this state.”).

7 MCL 600.8101(1) (“A district court is established in the state.”).

8 Many other states have trial courts whose jurisdictions are limited by dollar thresholds. See Dollar Amount Jurisdiction for Tort, Contract, Real Property, and Small Claims Filings in State Trial Courts, 2010, available at <http://www.courtstatistics.org/~media/Microsites/Files/CSP/SCCS/2010/Civil-Dollar_Amount_Jurisdiction> [http://perma.cc/69K6-MM8A]; see also 21 CJS, Courts, § 22, pp 31-32 (“Under various constitutional or statutory provisions, superior courts of general jurisdiction are limited in their jurisdiction to cases involving amounts in excess of a specified amount, and inferior courts of limited jurisdiction are limited in their jurisdiction to actions involving amounts between specified amounts.”). cases according to their value. Accordingly, a case with a value exceeding $25,000 is intended for the circuit court and constitutes a “circuit court case,” and a case with a value not exceeding $25,000 is intended for the district court and constitutes a “district court case.” It follows that a plaintiff with a “circuit court case” acts in accordance with the law when he or she pleads the appropriate amount in controversy in the circuit court, and a plaintiff with a “district court case” acts in accordance with the law when he or she pleads the appropriate amount in controversy in the district court.

But, of course, it may come to pass as a result of evolving circumstances, as perhaps it has in the instant case, that a party will plead an amount in controversy not exceeding $25,000 and yet litigate what is a “circuit court case”-- one with a value exceeding $25,000-- in the district court. Such a pleading would not then reflect the bona fide value of the case. Nonetheless, such a pleading is not necessarily one made in bad faith because the plaintiff may intend to litigate the “circuit court case” as a “district court case” by presenting only the arguments and evidence needed to demonstrate entitlement to the lower damages reflected by the amount in controversy stated in the pleading.

9 See, e.g., 21 CJS, Courts, § 22, at 32 (“[T]he policy [of specifying a jurisdictional amount] is to force litigants whose disputes involve only comparatively trifling amounts to resort to inferior courts . . . .”).

10 It is also possible that a plaintiff could file a case in the district court in the good-faith, but incorrect, belief that the case has a value not exceeding $25,000 and learn only later in the proceedings that the case, in fact, has a value exceeding $25,000. Such a plaintiff could not be said to have pleaded the amount in controversy in bad faith. Although the trial court is not ousted of jurisdiction in such circumstances, it remains responsible for enforcing its procedural and evidentiary rules, and for exercising its trial-management prerogatives, in a manner that ensures that any inconsistency between the amount in controversy pleaded and the actual value of the case does not prejudice or disadvantage the defendant.
However, when a plaintiff pleads an amount in controversy with the intention to litigate a case inconsistent with that amount, the plaintiff has thwarted the Legislature’s intention, and the pleading has been made in bad faith. In other words, while the plaintiff may have nominally pleaded a case within the district court’s jurisdiction by alleging an amount in controversy not exceeding $25,000, he or she did so with the intention of litigating a “circuit court case” in the district court in contravention of the Legislature’s intention that such a case belongs in the circuit court. A plaintiff does not, at least in my judgment, comply with § 8301(1) merely by pleading-- and thus being willing to accept-- an amount in controversy not exceeding $25,000; rather, to avoid a finding of bad faith, the plaintiff must plead with the intention to comply with the legal obligation to litigate that case in a manner consistent with the jurisdictional limit set by the Legislature. So when a plaintiff has a case with a value exceeding $25,000-- that is, a “circuit court case”-- and wishes to litigate in the district court by pleading an amount in controversy not exceeding $25,000, he or she may do so consistent with the Legislature’s intentions only by litigating the case as though it is valued at the pleaded amount, to wit, as a “district court case.”

Pleading an amount in controversy in bad faith not only is incompatible with the Legislature’s intention, but also is incompatible with the integrity of the judicial process, which requires the district court to exercise only the power “conferred upon it by” the Legislature. Rabaut, 389 Mich at 331. When a plaintiff pleads in good faith, a court can effectively police the boundaries of its jurisdiction simply by examining the face of the pleadings, but when a plaintiff pleads in bad faith, because the pleadings fall only nominally within the court’s power, the court risks, through no fault of its own, exercising authority that the Legislature did not intend it to exercise. Such an exercise of power is incompatible with the integrity of our judicial process, and when it is a function of the plaintiff’s own conduct in the pleadings, the court is justified in finding that he or she has pleaded in bad faith.11

As suggested above, litigating a “circuit court case” in the district court is incompatible with both the Legislature’s intention and the integrity of the judicial process, and, consequently, a pleading intended to facilitate this as a litigation strategy is a pleading made in bad faith. That bad faith is further exemplified by the sheer incompatibility of a “circuit court case,” whose value exceeds $25,000, with the capabilities of the district court, which is designed for cases with values not exceeding $25,000. As a general proposition, it is reasonable to assume that the greater the amount of the claim, the more strenuously the parties will litigate, the more evidence will be placed before the jury, and the more numerous and complex will be the issues presented. By distinguishing the jurisdictions of the district court and the circuit court on the basis that the former generally hears cases with lesser amounts in controversy and the latter cases with greater amounts in controversy, the Legislature also presumably intended that 11 A court must continually question its jurisdiction at every “stage of the proceeding.” In re Estate of Fraser, 288 Mich 392, 394; 285 NW 1 (1939). The district court in particular must be vigilant in assessing its own jurisdiction because under some circumstances both parties may have an interest in litigating a “circuit court case” in the district court-- the plaintiff’s own decision would initiate the litigation in that venue, and the defendant might prefer the capped liability that results when a higher-value “circuit court case” is brought in the district court. Under such circumstances, the district court might be alone in upholding the integrity of the legislative and judicial processes. Id. (“Courts are bound to take notice of the limits of their authority . . .”).

the former generally hears cases of lesser complexity and the latter cases of greater complexity.\textsuperscript{12}

This Court’s own rules underscore the different levels of complexity inherent in typical “district court cases” and typical “circuit court cases.” For example, the discovery rule permits discovery as a matter of course in “circuit court cases” while permitting it only with the court’s leave or by the parties’ stipulation in district court cases. See MCR 2.302(A)(2). The case-evaluation rule is another example of a rule distinguishing between the two types of cases; the rule authorizes the shortening of deadlines for hearings and party briefs only in the district court. See MCR 2.403(A)(4). Such rules thus, in accordance with the Legislature’s intention, treat “district court cases” and “circuit court cases” differently, investing the former, where the amounts of disputes are lower, with procedures designed for more expedited resolution.\textsuperscript{13} Because of these and other differences in both court rules and statutes, as well as in the accumulated histories and experiences of the judges on these courts, the circuit court is the court best equipped \textsuperscript{12} The Legislature also has directed to the district court criminal matters of relatively lesser complexity. See MCL 600.8311 (giving the district court jurisdiction over “[m]isdemeanors punishable by a fine or imprisonment not exceeding 1 year”; “[o]rdinance and charter violations punishable by a fine or imprisonment”; “[a]rraignments, the fixing of bail and the accepting of bonds”; certain “[p]robable cause conferences”; “[p]reliminary examinations”; and “[c]ircuit court arraignments”). The district court’s civil and criminal jurisdictional statutes clearly indicate the Legislature’s intention to direct toward that court relatively less complex, less consequential, and more straightforward cases and controversies.

to hear “circuit court cases” and the district court, though being best equipped to hear “district court cases,” is correspondingly less well-equipped to hear “circuit court cases.” Therefore, a pleading resulting in the litigation of a “circuit court case” in the district court is also less compatible with the district court’s innate capabilities.

The district court’s jurisdictional limit, and what this requires of a plaintiff, can be appreciated perhaps by considering the following hypothetical. A plaintiff wishes to bring a personal-injury claim of less than $25,000 based on an injury to a single arm. This “one-arm case” may be brought in the district court, and the plaintiff will be free to fully present arguments and evidence as to the full extent of the injury. By contrast, another plaintiff wishes to bring a personal-injury claim that exceeds $25,000 based on injuries to both arms and both legs. In order to recover the full measure of damages, this “four-limb case” must be brought in the circuit court, because that court alone can award relief in an amount exceeding $25,000. The question posed by the instant case is whether the four-limb case, if brought in the district court by pleading an amount in controversy of $25,000, must be dismissed for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction on the basis that such a pleading was clearly made in bad faith. The answer, as suggested by the analysis above, depends on what type of case the plaintiff intended, when filing his or her pleading, to litigate. If the plaintiff intended to present evidence of the full extent of his or her injuries-- that is, if he or she intended to present the four-limb case-- then he or she pleaded in bad faith because, despite having pleaded an amount in controversy not exceeding $25,000, he or she intended to litigate a “circuit court case” in the district court. In these circumstances, because the plaintiff’s bad faith creates the risk that the district court will hear a “circuit court case,”” the district court must dismiss the case. A plaintiff intending to litigate the four-limb case in the district court may do so, but only by restricting himself or herself to the presentation of arguments and evidence consistent with the amount in controversy pleaded, and not merely by demonstrating a willingness to accept damages not exceeding $25,000. Thus, the critical inquiry in assessing bad faith is whether the plaintiff clearly intended to litigate a case inconsistent with the amount in controversy pleaded.

However, whether the plaintiff intends to present a case consistent with the amount in controversy pleaded may be a difficult question because the plaintiff’s intention to engage in litigation tactics illustrative of bad faith will not often be obvious from the face of the complaint. The trial court therefore must be attentive to assessing the presentation of arguments and evidence that may reasonably communicate that the plaintiff in reality has pursued a “circuit court case” in the district court for the purpose of obtaining some litigation advantage.14 14 In the instant case, plaintiff alleged a “closed head injury,” “pains in left shoulder, back, neck area, [and] lower back,” and a “bruise on [the] left ankle,” as well as “expenses for care, recovery, or rehabilitation,” “loss of wages,” “replacement services,” and “attendant care.” It is not clear from these allegations that plaintiff’s claim had a value exceeding $25,000; nor is it clear that by filing the case she intended to litigate a “circuit court case” in the district court. But had the district court inquired into the issue of bad faith at the pleadings, it may nonetheless have concluded, similar to the court in Fix, that plaintiff clearly had no intention of litigating a case consistent with the amount in controversy pleaded. Such an inquiry may have revealed that plaintiff intended from the outset to litigate a “circuit court case” in the district court by presenting evidence of injuries exceeding $25,000. As in Fix, evidence of such an intention might show that the pleadings themselves were clearly made in bad faith and thus warrant dismissal.

C. EVIDENCE OF BAD-FAITH PLEADING

A plaintiff acts in bad faith when he or she litigates a “circuit court case” in the district court for the purpose of obtaining some litigation advantage. The district court must be vigilant to such conduct, which, because it may suggest the plaintiff’s intentions at the time of his or her pleadings, may constitute evidence of the plaintiff’s pleading in bad faith. I offer an illustrative listing of circumstances that may support a finding of bad faith in the amount in controversy pleaded.

1. EXCESSIVE EVIDENCE

One way by which a plaintiff may achieve an unfair advantage by litigating a “circuit court case” in the district court is, despite having pleaded an amount in controversy not exceeding $25,000, by presenting evidence of injuries that do exceed $25,000. Such conduct places the defendant at a disadvantage because although liability is limited to $25,000, the defendant will nonetheless be required to prepare a defense that is not similarly limited. In the instant case, for example, defendant first learned during discovery that plaintiff’s injuries could be as high as $250,000. Even though plaintiff was willing to accept only $25,000 in damages, defendant had to be prepared to litigate a $250,000 case, i.e., a “circuit court case.” A defendant facing a “circuit court case” must be prepared to defend against a “circuit court case,” regardless of the venue in which that case is filed. This greater preparation may lead to higher legal costs, which may at some point come to be viewed as disproportionate to the liability created by the amount pleaded, and ultimately create undue pressures to settle, where no such pressures may have been created had the plaintiff litigated a bona fide “district court case.”\textsuperscript{15} By taking advantage of the jurisdictional rules, the plaintiff has shifted the defendant’s settlement calculus from a traditional evaluation of case strengths and weaknesses to an evaluation of the benefits of litigating in the district court and of the expenditure of “circuit court case” legal costs.

2. ABSENCE OF DISCOVERY

Similar unfair advantage in arguing a “circuit court case” in the district court may be gained by the absence of mandatory discovery in the district court. As a general rule, “parties may obtain discovery by any means provided in [MCR 2.301 \textit{et seq}.],” but “in the district court, no discovery is permitted . . . except by leave of the court or on the stipulation of all parties.” MCR 2.302(A)(1), (2); see also \textit{Ward v McNamara Community Hosp}, 426 Mich 855 (1986). This “major limitation[] on discovery,” 1985 Staff Comment to MCR 2.302, is consistent with the Legislature’s intention that the district court hear only cases whose values do not exceed $25,000, many of which may be straightforward enough to render discovery unnecessary. Moreover, in genuine “district court cases,” the absence of discovery often enables parties to avoid the expenditure of time and resources more typically associated with “circuit court cases.”

\textsuperscript{15} I am cognizant that the backdrop of such a case will always be that a $25,000 maximum settlement may be significantly less than the defendant might have faced in the circuit court. However, once filed in the district court, a case becomes a “district court case,” and a defendant should not have to settle on the basis of “circuit court case” considerations. More importantly, whatever the practical equities facing the two parties, the people of this state are entitled to have the laws of their representatives respected and the jurisdiction of their courts honored.
But where the plaintiff seeks to litigate a “circuit court case” in the district court, the absence of discovery could greatly hinder a defending party. When a plaintiff pleads an amount in controversy for the purpose of obtaining district court jurisdiction, yet is allowed to present argument and evidence significantly exceeding $25,000, the defendant could face a hardship because of an inability to learn more about the claim and to present a complete defense. In the absence of discovery, the plaintiff’s settlement leverage described above is further magnified because the defendant must then weigh the potentially disproportionate costs of litigating a “circuit court case” against the financial exposure of a “district court case,” and must do so without full knowledge of the plaintiff’s claim. Thus, not only has the plaintiff gained an unfair advantage by our rules of jurisdiction, he or she has gained an unfair advantage by our rules of procedure. In the instant case, for example, it is possible that plaintiff may have withheld most of, if not all, the details of her injuries and their treatment, because the full extent of plaintiff’s injuries—amounting to as much as $250,000—came to light only during subsequent discovery. Yet in pleading an amount in controversy to obtain the jurisdiction of the district court, plaintiff may have been motivated at least in part by the possibility that there would be little or no discovery in that court. That such discovery ultimately occurred should not distract from an inquiry into why plaintiff, whose case had a potential value of $250,000, pleaded a “district court case” and then appeared to litigate a “circuit court case,” for what matters is plaintiff’s bad faith at the pleadings. Only an amount in controversy pleaded for the purpose of litigating a “circuit court case” in the district court ousts the district court of jurisdiction.
3. OFFER OF JUDGMENT

A plaintiff may further obtain an unfair advantage in arguing a “circuit court case” in the district court through the offer-of-judgment rule, MCR 2.405. Under that rule, one party (the offeror) may make a settlement offer, and if the other party (the offeree) rejects the offer, the offeree may be liable for the offeror’s litigation costs unless the offeree improves his or her position at trial. The rule thereby “encourage[s] settlement and . . . deter[s] protracted litigation.” Hamilton v Becker Orthopedic Appliance Co, 214 Mich App 593, 596; 543 NW2d 60 (1995) (quotation marks and citation omitted). But an unfair advantage may also be gained because offers of judgment “are formulated by the parties themselves, creating the possibility that a party may make an offer not in a bona fide attempt to settle the case, but merely to create the possibility of securing an award of costs.” Freeman v Consumers Power Co, 437 Mich 514, 519 n 8; 473 NW2d 63 (1991). In particular, an unfair advantage may be gained when a plaintiff files an offer of judgment just below the jurisdictional maximum amount in controversy. The defendant, in choosing whether to accept or reject the offer, say an offer of $24,900, must 16 The offer-of-judgment rule may be contrasted with the case-evaluation rule, MCR 2.403. The latter also seeks to shift fees to a party that refuses to accept an offered “case-evaluation award.” But unlike an offer of judgment, which is formulated by the offering party itself and may not always reflect “a bona fide attempt to settle the case,” a case-evaluation award is formulated “by three lawyers who are wholly uninvolved in the litigation” and thus not susceptible to a plaintiff’s gamesmanship. Freeman, 437 Mich at 519 n 8. Case evaluation is prominent in the circuit court. See MCR 2.403(A)(2) (“Case evaluation of tort cases filed in circuit court is mandatory . . . .”); ICLE, Michigan Civil Procedure (April 2014), § 14.1, p 1034 (“Most cases in circuit court in which monetary relief is sought are submitted to case evaluation.”). It is not, however, required in the district court. See MCR 2.403(A)(4).

then consider, not only its own costs of litigating to a verdict, but also the risks of having to pay the plaintiff’s costs, for which the defendant will be liable unless it can improve on the $24,900 at trial. But because the plaintiff may be offering evidence in support of injuries well in excess of $25,000, and thereby litigating a “circuit court case” in the district court, the defendant, to achieve a more favorable result at trial, faces the task of having to convince the jury to discredit what may be a substantial amount of plaintiff’s evidence in order to reduce the final award to an amount below $24,900. Thus, by submitting an offer of judgment just below the district court’s jurisdictional maximum while litigating a “circuit court case,” plaintiff may be able to gain an unfair advantage under the jurisdictional and procedural rules by recovering nearly the same amount (either $24,900 or $25,000), regardless of whether defendant accepts or rejects the offer of judgment.

4. JURY CONFUSION

Pleading a jurisdictional amount in bad faith in the district court may also entail interference with the jury function. The presentation of evidence of injury typical of a “circuit court case” may, as explained above, unfairly and directly disadvantage the defendant. It may also unfairly and indirectly disadvantage the defendant by skewing in plaintiff’s favor a jury finding of liability, despite the fact that findings of injury and liability are distinct considerations. Professor Brian Bornstein, for example, asserted this result after presenting mock jurors with factual scenarios in which evidence of liability was held constant while evidence of the magnitude of injury varied. Bornstein concluded that fact-finders “will make different [liability] judgments depending upon the severity of the plaintiff’s injury." That is, the more abundant the evidence of injury presented, the more likely it is, all else being equal, that liability will be found. This is not only a matter of social-science evidence, but a matter that may be seen as affirmed by ordinary and commonsense understandings of human psychology: where two parties present evidence and seek damages for injuries done to a single arm, the party who is allowed to present evidence, beyond the scope of the case, that he or she also suffered injury to the other three limbs will tend to fare better between the two litigants. Evidence of the injuries to all four limbs might be relevant in a “circuit court case,” but in the district court, evidence of injury beyond the one arm might be irrelevant and prejudicially excessive. Consequently, the plaintiff’s advantaging himself or herself of such an effect might well suggest bad faith.

5. JURY INFLUENCING

By litigating a “circuit court case” in the district court, the plaintiff may also take advantage of another cognitive bias, known as the “anchoring effect,” that could affect the jury. According to Professor Daniel Kahneman, this “occurs when people consider a particular value for an unknown quantity before estimating that quantity.” He asserts that the anchoring effect influences decisions even if the “particular value” considered has nothing to do with the quantity to be estimated. In the context of a jury trial, the anchoring effect suggests that the jury’s final award may sometimes be unduly affected by a large initial presentation of damages.\textsuperscript{20} Accordingly, a jury may rely on a plaintiff’s initial “anchoring value” to set the award’s range and then reach a final award by “discounting.”\textsuperscript{21} Consider the case, for example, in which a plaintiff who has suffered injury to four limbs is allowed to sue in the district court and the jury apprehends--perhaps from the presentation of the case or from its own inferences--that the value of the claim is $100,000. The jury may in the end decide to “discount” the claim by some amount, say 50%, on the basis that the testimony regarding pain and suffering was only partially credible, yielding a final award of $50,000. The court will reduce the $50,000 award to $25,000, in accordance with the plaintiff’s pleading and the limits of its own jurisdiction. If, however, the plaintiff had been required to litigate the case in the district court as a “district court case,” say one in which he or she had suffered injury only to one arm, the jury’s 50% discount would have applied to a $25,000 claim, yielding a final post-discount award of $12,500. While a plaintiff may have no control over the discount a jury applies to the amount the plaintiff seeks to recover, by litigating a “circuit court case” in the district court, a plaintiff separates the value of the claim from the amount of damages sought and potentially facilitates a legal environment in which the anchoring bias inures to his or her advantage.

18 Defendant here challenged plaintiff’s offering of “excessive” evidence of injury as “cumulative.” The motion was opposed by plaintiff and denied by the trial court.

\textsuperscript{20} See, e.g., Chopra, \textit{The Psychology of Asking a Jury for a Damage Award}, Plaintiff Magazine, March 2013, p 7 (“Early research looking at the way jurors used anchoring in the context of jury damage awards suggested that the larger the lump sum request made by plaintiff’s counsel, the larger the average award.”); Sunstein et al., \textit{Assessing Punitive Damages (With Notes on Cognition and Valuation in Law), Behavioral Law & Economics} (Sunstein ed) (Cambridge University Press, 2000), p 235 (“The amount demanded by the plaintiff also affected the size of the awards, most likely an anchoring effect, which influences the award directly . . . .”).

III. CONCLUSION

A party pleads in bad faith by setting forth an amount in controversy within the district court’s jurisdiction while intending to litigate a “circuit court case” in the district court. See Fix, 83 Mich at 563. While bad-faith pleadings are rare, when they do occur, they undermine the law of our state and the integrity of our judicial process, and they give rise to conditions at trial in which a party may be unfairly prejudiced. In particular, because each of the parties may, under some circumstances, view litigating a “circuit court case” in the district court as being within the party’s interest, the district court is obligated to be vigilant in identifying bad-faith conduct, and it must be prepared to “question sua sponte its own jurisdiction” in order to preserve the aforementioned values. Straus, 459 Mich at 532. Such jurisdiction may be questioned “at any stage of the proceeding,” and when the circumstances clearly demonstrate that jurisdiction has been obtained by a pleading in bad faith, the case must be dismissed. Estate of Fraser, 288 Mich at 394.
